

I enjoyed 'To be a cat' because it is very descriptive and it seems like you're in the boy's (Barney's) shoes as you read it, and it's very tense. When Barney's cruel, biased headmistress tells him off again for a prank he didn't pull and sends a letter home to his mum, he wishes he could be a cat. His wish gradually comes true, and he realises that he must find out how to turn back and help the cat in his body escape his school bully. On the way, he manages to tell his friend and takes refuge in her narrowboat. Together they figure out how to get Barney back in his own body.

The cover of the book

